A neurologist went under a neurosurgeon to remove a mass in his brain. One week later, the neurologist told me that the neurosurgeon did not know what he was doing. How could a surgeon do the procedure he did and not know what he was doing? A: Neurosurgeons do not have a monopoly on the "know what they're doing" - there are many others in the field. It is just that they're in an advanced specialty and most neurosurgeons have been trained in the work of a brain surgeon. Your specific example would have to be examined to see why the "know what they're doing" isn't there. In general, I think you should not get your doctor to explain everything they do, and especially not if it is something the patient can check themselves. In general, I'd be a lot more concerned if a patient got the impression from a visit to a neurologist that "they don't know what they're doing" than if they got it from a visit to a neurosurgeon. Creative approach to rehabilitation: how we worked with people with dementia. Research in inpatient rehabilitation for people with dementia has been dominated by the study of two general approaches. One approach emphasizes psychosocial rehabilitation and the other cognitive rehabilitation. In this article, we describe a third approach, which we call a "creative rehabilitation." We then show the relevance of this approach to the hospital setting and explore the challenges of providing this kind of care. In developing a creative rehabilitation approach, we worked with individuals with dementia and families. We incorporated philosophy and creative arts into the care of people with dementia and sought an emotional approach. We describe 82157476af
